

Am I a "Machine"? Do I Get "Overwhelmed"?

High Priest Hooded Cobra 666

January 26, 2023

Gear88 [wrote]:

@HP.HC666

By any chance do you ever feel at times overwhelmed by being an HP?

...

*I know the other people did their thing from time-to-time. But you seemingly do more work than others, does it overwhelm you?

Does it ever feel bad for you? Or are you some Saturn Machine that relishes in the works?

...

It seems people are so negative. No surprise the Gods need to intervene. As you put it the Gods can't abandon Humanity but many of the Gods send "bodyguards" to people who summon them to sense how evil and sinful they are and when they met some random dickhead who is dirty and drossy as fuck they ignore the person.*

...

It's certainly a very high task and energy and demand occupation.

I would say I am solely motivated by an exuberant love that arose out of encountering the Gods and what we are to become in the future. I also loved humanity in contrast to most people who see the hateful sides in it.

The JoS for me was a most pivotal turn where I understood that humanity can actually improve in ways not understood ever before. I have never seen things like this than what I have in JoS, and I don't mean solely on outcome, but in MEANING.

Then I started eventually seeing the best in everyone despite of what they think about themselves on the current level where people are.

The transformative touch and caring hand of the Gods in my own life is something then I considered of the maximum value to give to other people, for reasoning that has to do with what I consider the proper thing to do.

Certain transformations have been mental. For example, as some people might hate carrying their babies and cleaning diapers, others indeed see even that situation as a loving and positive situation of a beautiful being growing up. Where you see mud, others see the potential lotuses that can come up, and so on.

With that, go away all potential fears, worries, that one might die, or whatever, out of the window.

After extremely transformative experiences, I found it very curious that these things were possible, and I really thought that I should do everything in my power for "like-minded" people out there.

Without a deep love and duty for others you will not make it, as there is no service that is done to one's self, it's a sacrifice based and honor based occupation which the Gods reward in many other ways which most people don't consider yet acceptable in their ways, as most things one is blessed with are spiritual blessings.

That is not to say I have not been blessed in other ways too, but the primary reason is because you want to help. I have also been cursed considerably by the enemy and so on, but the key takeaway is what the Gods think of you, not deranged slime.

I will exit this life likely as an "auntie-semetic criminal oy vey Hitler gasser of billions" and so on, but this won't really matter. Currently, humanity is coming in terms with the idea that people like this weren't evil in any way, but just tried to warn people of impending dangers they likely didn't want to accept. It's not the first time this happens and likely won't be the last.

As far as the position is concerned the case is people might look up to you but this comes with grand responsibilities towards them, their wellbeing, their soul but also you have to tend to them in a way that is both non-invasive but also closeby with them.

All of this is also rather trying and everyday so, because one has to be Just or at least try to be Just and effective at all times. There are layers to these difficulties present here.

I wish things were different and I wouldn't have to make any decision that was on anyone's even remote emotional distaste, but this is unavoidable how the world is today.

We have to make ourselves distaste ourselves, and shake ourselves out of the coma of our own fallen situation, or there will not be any progress made. I have shaken myself many of these, so nobody here must think I had no obstacles. We're going forward.

In fact, I am fighting the very same battle but maybe on wholly other levels and layers. Nobody is free from illusion of a lesser or higher extent in this domain.

There is always the lingering thought of what you might have done "something else" yet there was never nothing else, and I went "all in".

It's certainly super high risk, with a large negative side, and certainly not "peaceful", especially due to enemy interference, or playing with a stacked deck against an enemy who has stacked the deck all in their favor.

There is no compass on this choice except of the love of the Gods and the legitimate SS, nothing else. We were given bricks and stones of a lost time, and we are reconstructing these perfectly in a way that will make any wise man understand that this is the work of the Divine Power being at play.

But one cannot really start explaining the many positives related to serving people which in my perception make anything else appear for nothing. You also have to have a different values system for your existence and that of others as many times you cannot justify anything based on the values you "see".

I can therefore never be "saddened" over certain other areas which are expected by others, and they measure these as "success".

I find also the price of a sacrificed life of mine to be very small compared to what will be achieved for everyone else and even society, which is positive understanding.

Sacrificed here is also a great word to use, because that's not a negative one. To become more accurate, weird as this might sound, all of this has been a transcendence way beyond one's "ego". That's not to say that you need to kill your "ego" and other corny shit, but to just show that self overcoming is necessary to be a habit by the time one wants to embark in anything like this.

"Yourself" has to many times learn to be shut down. The higher layer of ourselves is just very powerful, yet it has to have a strong "ego" upon which to seat. The problems begin when the lower ego starts acting as its own agency and one finds themselves in numerous non-intended paths.

I can say also this post of service has a lot of pain in it, particularly pain that comes from the woes and plights of others, but also there are many examples of the opposite, so there is an influx of both.

But I welcome all your pain and all the joys. That is life.

If one follows what the Gods array in front of them, then one will be absolutely fine. But one has to follow and to take them seriously. This takes first to know them, first and foremost. And to know them you need to practice. And knowing comes in levels.

The high and ever higher level of difficulty on a functional level I perceive as an opportunity to advance both myself and others, because I see no other more demanding but also meaningful task than this.

When I think also of the brothers and sisters in Satan and the family of Satan, or people who have upheld me and helped me or the JoS even in trivial ways or even more directly, I am instantly revitalized and ready to do more. Sometimes your best Guardians and the souls you are closer to are continents away...

A situation I am "fed up with" is that I would "desire" for everyone to be "better", but for the sake of themselves. It's not out of a demand, it's really about others embarking too in the case of trying to find their own potential instead of just sitting there to be farmed by forces that want to deprive them of that.

That is that most people need to blossom out, which would be my only thing I would want to see "happen" more often. I feel like it's a bad cut of a deal when one hasn't tried to advance in life, and that life goes to waste [which is the reason we have to reincarnate, among others].

One more bitterness is when I see people deviate themselves off the path because I know inherently and through massive experience, that nothing will eventually "fulfil" them, and they are only losing time or lives trying to understand until their eventual "return".

The life on the premise of self that they seek would also be quite magnified if they were close to the Gods, which is also another misplacement of understanding, where people think that anything would be better "away" from this, choosing ignorance pointlessly in a world that is a school to eventually get you out of that state, and maybe with a lot of grounding involved...

Yet again I believe everything is as it should be as I completely believe in the Gods and I would be ignorant to stay that I don't have proof of this of being "not true", despite of human opinions on the subject. It's all as it always were.

About the overwhelming part the answer is that one is overwhelmed at first but eventually copes and manages to conquer this.

This doesn't mean it won't happen because it will happen again, but one also encounters their own limits and starts questioning where these are and progressively breaking through them. Then you look back at the previous limit and now it's a baseline. And you learn to keep going.

Everyone's improving, so everything that at some point was "overwhelming" eventually becomes something one can manage.

The limit here might be too high for one and then another but everyone can grow, that is no secret strange recipe here besides to do what one should do.

The point is how many of us will actually sit down to do that in the end. This sounds "easy", but it's the most difficult thing to do.

Lastly humanity isn't really "evil", it's just fighting under a veil of ignorance which produces in increasing amounts what we call "evil". This eventually can be minimized to a great extent the more humans become of what we refer to as enlightened, which is based on internal practice.

Then "evil" will minimize itself. Whether this will be "many", "some", or "some individual humans" is a whole other topic - up to everyone involved. I am just trying to do my case and help others make theirs, what the "whole of it does" is something we would like to give an opportunity to people, but we cannot forcibly decide about.

I have never seen humanity as vile, disgusting or evil, or I wouldn't do what I do.

It's a handiwork building itself slowly and with the ups and downs involved in creation, always in the vision of the Gods. And eventually it will succeed as a whole or as a part, no matter what, yet this won't happen by inactive or lack of action but by the contrary.

This is where we humans must take place and put ourselves into, because we are not exempt from this active act of our own creation.